Excerpt: . . . for grass which can be utilized at any and all seasons of the year. It also does away with the necessity for elaborate and costly farm buildings; for the food off ten acres of land can be stored in a 100 or 125-ton silo occupying a few feet of ground, whereas, to handle the same crop in the form of roughness would require an expensive barn. It is very much cheaper for the farmer to build silos for the protection of his food than the large structures required to handle his hay and stover. These are not all the advantages of the silo but they are enough to be suggestive of its wide utility. CROPS FOR THE SILO A great variety of crops can be utilized for the silo. Corn is generally placed first, and in many respects it is still the leading crop. Possibly it is the best adapted for general use, taking the country as a whole, but for the South it has a rival in sorghum. Two kinds of corn may be utilized for silage; the large, coarse varieties, requiring a long time to mature, and the smaller and earlier maturing varieties. The larger varieties should be planted early, from April 1 to 15. The smaller varieties may be planted as a second crop, since they require only from 90 to 100 days to mature. Corn forms the best kind of silage for dairy cows because it does not affect the flavor...
