The malcontents multiplied, in proportion as the National Assembly proceeded in its reformatons: its most zear lous partisans were sometimes astonished at its boldness, and its enemies affected to despise it for imprudence. They were persuaded, that its labours would endure but for a moment, and that the nation would, ere long, be obliged to return to the late government, or, at least, to accept the conditions of the seance royale, of the paternal wisdom of which conditions they still boasted without intermission. Determined on regaining their rights, or, at least, to obtain revenge or to perish, they employed at once all the means which each derived from his former dignity, or from his former influence. The army had been ever their hope; no pains were spared to detach-it from...
